> "Is there any instance of the rejection by the Senate of the incoming Senators who have actually taken the oath?"
>
> "Not to my knowledge," replied Mr. Grey. "The minutes for the pass fitty years do not indicate any such act."

Mr. Grey held that, as distinguished from a judicial function, he did not think it was. The House, he held, when organized, takes from the constitution the power to judge of the election and return of its own members, but until the organization takes place, this cannot he done, as the act is not derived upon one person or a few, but the whole House, and therefore a certificate of election, whether true or false, stands as prima facie evidence entitling the person holding it to participate in the organization. Mr. Grey next touched upon the question as to whether there was such a position as temporary President. He denied that nine members, which was less than a quorum, had the right to effect a permanent organization. "Therefore," said Mr. Grey, "as the Constitution dos not recognize such an office as temporary President, Mr. Adrain has no ocial relation, even to the minority of the Senate. He has no title to inpuire into, and as Mr. Rogers is therfore ne cause for the issue of a writ of quo warrants."

Mr. Grey characterized the nine Democratic Senators as an impotent and arrogant absurdity, and said as a Senate they were about as useless as if they had each remained by their own fireside enjoying domestic felicity.

Mr. Grey in closing his argument said that the stuation as it now is, was disgraceful, extraordinary, scandalous and outrageous, and in view of the example which it would establish, he prayed God that the vourt would not deliver an opinion upholding the Adrain Senate. Alian McDermott, counsel for President Robert Adrian, followed Mr. Grey. The first part of Mr. McDermott's argument was upon the question of a continuous Senate. Mr. McDermott's argument was upon the puestion of a continuous Senate. Mr. McDermott said that the whole of the argument in Mr. Rogers's behalf was upon the fact that a certificate of election was primafacle evidence. He would produce argument to show that the section of the election law under which this was held had been entirely abrogated by the State constitution of 1846.
